Dear Mr. Hedgehog,

I'm Jakub, an experienced fullstack software engineer. A few months ago I integrated PostHog into ogarni.AI - my personal finance tool (so creative, right? ☺). I got lucky with timing: „Logs" and „LLM analytics" dropped right after I onboarded (which let me rip out everything else. I was hooked.

So hooked, that when I realized the .NET SDK didn't support AI features, I couldn't stomach using anything else. I just... submitted a PR. Mid-way through I asked myself, „Why the hell do I care this much about a tool?" Then it clicked: „I should probably work here"

The cult(ure) you've built is rare. I've seen startups push hard on culture, only to watch it vanish the second they got acquired. Could that happen to PostHog? Maybe someday - but your identity is so tightly wound into your success that abandoning it would be suicide. In an era where customers have to like you, not just tolerate you, PostHog is borderline un-dislikeable.

My take? PostHog in the AI era is what oil was to industrialization - not optional. Every builder will need it, whether they know it yet, or not. I want to be part of that engine.

I'm a geek at my core. If we are spending most of our waking hours building stuff, it better be fun - and building for builders is the most fun there is. When I'm happy, the product's better, and since your customers are people like me, I already know what makes them tick.

So yeah. Let's ship something cool

~Jakub
